Maria, hi.

I've reached out to the Red Hook team and to my board chair and school attorney. We're collectively at a loss on how to address the neighbor's resumed attacks and antics. Maria at RedHook suggested I reach out to you for any advice on recourse or next steps.

Today, she blasted inappropriate music over the wall. Thankfully, between the wind and the sounds of children playing and engaging in PE, it was drowned out and nearly inaudible. (I sat outside and worked for a while to monitor it.) She's also resumed her blog posts and changed the language on it. She's no longer simply attacking and besmirching the school, but she's targeted me by name repeatedly; both headlines and framing of the blog name me, not just the school, as . In recent posts, I've again become the focus. Even in her "satirical take" two weeks ago, the "villain" had my initials and the parallels were obvious.

Per advice and directive from my board chair, I filed a harassment claim with Metro in December. Things subsided through the holidays, but the posts have resumed with consistency since our January Town Hall. My board chair attended the evening Town Hall, and she found it to go smoothly, as I shared with you, and while the neighbors who were there disagreed with what I said, they were far calmer and more polite than the November Town Hall. I thought the issues and concerns might be settling; that is clearly not the case.

I am at a loss on what to do next. Ignoring her seems to be as detrimental as responding, and there does not seem to be a solution. If you have any suggestions or know of anyone else with whom I should connect, please let me know.

Thanks,
Sandra
